Bublications. FASTEST BOY IN NEW YORK. BY TONY PASTOR, AUTHOR OF "OLD SLEUTH, THE DETECTIVE." CHAPTER I.

CHAPTER I.

"And so have I." was the reply by the lad thus adcased, as he displayed the polished barrel of a sevenoter in the bright light shed by a magnificent chaniter under which he was standing.
This scene occurred in the gorgeously-furnished paris of a modern Circe, who practised her fatal allureents behind the protection of an imposing stone out, situated upon one of the most fashlomable streets the city of New York. The origin of the threatened addy encounter, at depicted in our opening pararaph, was thus wise:
Charley Page, a handsome, daring youth of nineteen, a sone of a millionaire, and known among his hundreds for qualitances as the "Fastes" Boy in New York, at spent the afternoon upon a froit, or what is more cuerally termed by the boys "a high old bender," the a number of young campanions. As a "wind up" with the inmates of the house, the party of yours were suddenly startled by the entrance into the room of a young girl of fifteen, whose exquisite beauty shone out in striking contrast ic the appearance of the other and older girls.

Charley Page was the first to notice this vision of innocence and loveliness. He was but a youth, but he had been rearred amid the fast life of the great metropolitan city. He was keen. He was experienced; a rapid reader of the human face. It came like an inspiration that here was some horrible scheme yet in its incipiency. There was not a line upon the girl's lovely face nor a glance of her beautiful eyes which did not indicate the sacred charm of innocence. He rose from his seat and advanced toward this child.

As he advanced the time intercepted him, and boware with the graciousness of a court lady, said:

"No, no, charley. Lotts is calling you—go and firt with her."

With her."

Charley flashed at her an indignant look, and said:

"Allow me, if you please."

"Why, Charley, what a rufflan you are getting to be,"
said the Circe, playfully.

But Charley was paying no heed to her. He had algready selzed the young girl by the hand, who, blushing from shoulders to temples, gazed at him with at arprised and bewildered look, as he said, patronizingly:
"Come, little girl, I want to ask you some questions;" and he attempted to draw her toward a sofa which stood in an alcove at the rear of the back pariot.

The astonished and frightened girl gently resisted, and attempted to withdraw her hand from his grasp. At this juncture the Circe interposed, and said:
"Come, come, Charley, you must not be so rough. Don't you see that you are frightening the child. Unlose her, and I will introduce you; and then if you wish to converse with Blanche, i have no doubt the dear child will be pleased to talk with you." Turning to the child, she continued: "Blanche, my dear, this is Charle, Page, my nephew."

"That's a lie," blurted out Charley, Bercely.

Upon heaving this shrupt contradiction of her assertion, the Circe drew herself up, and the paleness of her face shone out ghastly from beneath the pain, as she said, addressing the girl:
"Blanche, go to your room. Charley's drunk; you must excuse him."
"You can't go, Miss Blanche," exclaimed Charley.

shoulder.
A scene of excitement now ensued.
In the mean time, Charley had shaken off the grasp of the mistress of the house just in time to catch the sainting and falling form of Blanche in his arm. Passing her to the arms of his companions, he said, hurriedly, and in a tone of ferce command:
"Take her out, Fred, and put her in the coach, while I deal with this woman."

"Maybe the driver has got tired of waiting, and driven off." sugrested Ned.

"That question will be decided in a moment," answered Fred, as he hurried in advance of the other two, and peered in the darkness. In a moment he turned and called out: "It's all right, the carriage is there!" and he hurried on again in advance.

Arriving at the carriage, he opened the door and peered in, but not a soul was there.

"Thunder and Mars!" he cried, as Charley and Ned came up; "what the deuce has become of her?"

"Has she gone?" cried Charley.

"As sure as a gun! she's gone, bag and baggage!"

"How is that, Mike?" called out Charley to the driver; "when did that girl get out of the carriage?" replied the driver; "it she's left, be jabers! it's only a couple of minutes since she's gone; she was there five Entures ago, when I looked in.

"Rescued and lost!" muttered to Charley; "but thank the coung men then returned to their respective hence.

Among Charley's acquaintances was a handsome, brave-hearted voung for dispars.

Among Charley's acqueintances was a handsome, fraw-hearted young Englishman; a young son of a family of rank.

Arthur Willoughby, our hero's friend, like most young Englishman; a young son of a family of rank.

Arthur Willoughby, our hero's friend, like most young English gentiemen, was an expert in all man, y porter. How was an excellent marksman, a thorough gymnast, a gloser, and powerful oarsman. He was somewhat larger in stature than Charley, yet ever since their first infroguction there had existed a friendly rivalry between them as to their relative superiority in athletic sports.

About a week subsequent to the encounter in the home of the Circe, the two, accompanied by several of their fireda, met at a famous sporting resort, when the souversation turned upon bost racing. Charley incidentally mentioned the fact of his having been one of the winning "four" of the college crew.

"I say, Charley !" exclaimed Arthur; "I overmatched you at shooting, I'll give your eagle another chance to crow; I'll row you a single soull boat race."

"Done," cried Charley; "I'll row you one week from to-oay."

According to arrangements, the two aspirants for fowing honors repaired with a number of their friends to that beautiful sheet of water, the Harlem River. The distance agreed upon was three miles and a half, out and back. The odds in the betting between the many friends of the contestants favored the Englishman, owing to his apparent long reach, presumed qualities of endurance, and to his advantage in stature, and two years advanced age. As the two friends came to the edge of the water and exhibited their bared arms, dispisying ridges of hardened muscle, murmurs of admiration issued from the lips of the crowd.

In the lips of the signal. A half minute of intense anxiety ensured; the friends lining the knoll, from whence they commanded a full view of the whole course, leaned forward with pale, anxious faces, exhibiting more actual nervousness than the two athletic coutestants. One, two, go I and the two bosts shot forward like an arrow. The first dozen strokes gave Arthur half a boat's length lead; but by the time they had pulled a quarter of a mile, Charley succeeded in forging his boat a little to the front. A wild huzza rung out from his friends upon beholding this momentary advantage; but only for a moment did their wild enthusiasm continue. Arthur put on a tremendous spurt, and in the next forty lengths succeeded in again taking the lead, and was apparently gaining a triile at every stroke.

A wild hurrah of triumph now burst from the lips of the Englishman's rirends. This little forward and then behind movement was accepted as an indication of the ultimate result of the race. Even Chailey's friends felt inta the race was virtually decided. Although they had not been sanguine regarding the lessue, stil

"It's annybody's race vet."

"Is it? 's it?" cried a friend of Charley. "Look! book! What's that? Hurrah! Our boy's prow comes ahead."

"Hey! hey!" cried another impetuous youth, in the excitement of the moment forgetting decorum in his speech. "E glish muscle against Yankee pluck and cudurance, and pluck wins."

And true enough, amid a scene of inconceivable excitement and confusion, Charley dashed over the wining line, a winner by two ard a half boat lengths.

As Arthur Willoughby stepped ashore, in a frank, manly way he extended his hand to Charley, and said:

"Charley, my triend, you are my master at the oar."
"One swallow don't make a summer, neither does one race seitle the question of superiority."
"It settles it for me," good-naturedly responded Arthur; "and every hoat length, if we had continued the distance, you would have gained."

A splendid dioner followed the exciting event of the day. None of the party of youths had learned the advantages of strict temperance, and their convirually was raised and the string event of the day. None of the party of youths had learned the advantages of strict temperance, and their convirually was raised and their convirually was raised and their convirually was raised and their convirually was the string event of the day. An hour later beheld the three fashionable restaurant the majority of the party reside homeward; but Arthur, Charley, and Ned Woodhull, who were not quite as they as their companions, although pretty well "set up," determined to visit a famous gambling hell, as they as seried, to get square on the expenses of the day. An hour later beheld the three fast youths gathered sround the table in the gorgeously-furnished apartments of a notorious gambler. Charley was the only one engaged in the gaine. His two companions were standing at the back of his chair watching his manipulation of the checks. Arthur and Ned had been more successful; and, at the time we find them thus engaged, in was a heavy winner. There were but three other players besides our hero e side Chirley reached forth his hand and drew the whole pile toward himself.

"Hold on, neighbor!" exclaimed Charley, "you are raking in my cheeks."
"You go to Jericho, you pale-faced, narrow-fingered pickpocket, or I'll give you a smash in the jaw."
Arthur and Ned each trembled with excitement; they at once recognized the character of the fellow who had thus attempted to rob Charley. But Charley was ac cool as a cucumber, as he turned to the dealer, who said ool as a cucumber, as he turned to the dealer, who said ulefly:

"Well, young fellow, I didn't exactly notice that bet, ut it strikes me that the other gentleman played it."
"You know better," said Charley.
"I don't wish you to insinuate that I am a liar," cried he dealer, assuming a threatening attitude.
"No," said Charley, "I don't wish to insinuate that ou are a liar," but if you say that you don't know who hese cleeks belong to, I tell you directly that you are liar."
"You talk pretty loud, young fellow, for a boy. I'd erve you just right if I warmed your ears, but you ain't worth hitting." "You take bright if I warmed your ears, but you are worth hitting."
Aritur and Ned, fearing a bloody fight, now interfered and attempted to induce Charley to leave. The tered and attempted to induce Charley to leave. The galled down hero more than anything else, especially when the burly thief added:
"Yes, yes, go home, sonny; your mother will be frightened to death at your staying out so late!"
Whatever Charley's inward exidence of it as he turned and faced the villain, with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain, with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain, with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain, with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain, with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain with a cold gitter in his cycs, and and faced the villain with a cold gitter in his cycs.

you stole!"
"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed the rowdy. "Why, sonny you're wild; you've been drinking; if you waan't drunk i'd take you over my knee and spank you!"
Charler's tones were still frun, &s he said; "I can" a boy at that !"

This valignate secretion appeared to amuse the puglik wonderfully. If there is one thing that calls forth the admiration of one of this class, it is an exhibition of what they call pluck. The loungers about the apartments, attracted by the belikerent is, ak, had gastred around the disputants. One of them, a delicat redured, slim-bulk, harp-eved man, of about thirt dive, stepped around beside Charley, and whispered in his ear:

sear: My young friend, I'd advise you, as a friend, to ge out."

"Not yet," replied Charley, laconically.

"No you know the man you are disputing with?"
again he whispered.

"Yes, I know him," replied Charley.

At this juncture Arthur Willoughby spoke up, and said:

At this juncture Arthur Willoughby spoke up, and said:

"Look here, gentlemen, I think if my friend here can get fair play he'll give that frilow a good turashing."

A satirical smile broke over the countenance of the bysta-ders upon hearing this assertion. They looked goon the three youths as inomentarily made valiant by wine. Charley's opponent appeared particularly antused, as he said:
"Have you fellows got any money in your clothes?"
"Enough to cover suything you'll put up," rapited Charley, as he pashed the chair on which he had been sitting to one side.
"How much will you fight me for, young fellow?" said the rowdy.
"For five dollars, or five hundred," Charley replied. The balance of lony Pasion's great story, "The Fastest Boy in New York," will be found in No. 261 of the Fireside Companion, now ready and for saie by a hewsdeslers.
